Welcome to Genuis Audio., Nero Full Audio.The debate on the Conservative government's controversial new anti-terrorism law has come down to a simple question: should the police be allowed to force people to unlock the data in their phones or laptops? A decision by the Ontario Court of Appeal appears to have settled the issue for now. The law, which came into effect in June, has been widely criticized for going too far in limiting a person's right to privacy, with critics saying it violates basic human rights. Among other things, the law allows police to demand that someone unlock their phones or laptops to look for evidence of a crime. Critics say the law doesn't define "reasonable grounds" and that it will lead to innocent people being detained. But Canada's top court has said police must prove that they have "reasonable grounds" to force someone to hand over their phone or laptop - which police say is needed to prevent the public from being killed or kidnapped. Story continues below advertisement A critical question for the appeal judges was whether there is a reasonable expectation of privacy in a phone or laptop computer, meaning the police must prove they have reasonable grounds to open up the device and seek access to the information stored inside. In other words, can the police get warrantless access to people's private information stored on a device that does not belong to them? A 2012 decision by
