The Adobe Creative Cloud has always been an attractive proposition for photographers. The price is substantially lower than other software out there, and the promise is that, in the long run, you'll save money. But what I feel is missing is any discounts for the long-term, monthly, user base. Even two years ago when I wrote a supplement for lightroom I was informed that's where most photographers ended their subscription, when they probably could have had some sort of discount. Whether you subscribe to the monthly plan or the all-in-one, you should get access to the CC libraries. After resizing an image in Photoshop, if you have a really long edge that you don't want to crop to, you can fix the problem by selecting the image and copying it to a new document, then using the Crop tool and dragging the corner handles to make the image significantly smaller. The part of the photo that you don't want to crop off is offset from the center of the canvas. This feature is called the Lens Map (as if the map of your camera's "lens" were flat, anyway). If you resize an image near the right edge of the canvas, and then crop a portion of the photo that is next to that edge, you may find that neighboring objects can overlap slightly in the new image. This is called "softening". In Photoshop, you can make lightening the effect of softening by changing the amount of Downsample. For example, to reduce the effects of softening by one-half, you would hold down Ctrl when using the Soften tool, then set the Downsample option to 1/2. Higher Downsample values will make the softening effect less subtle.
