Designing for the web and mobile provides a lot of unique challenges for content designers. The size and scale of a mobile device means that content designers have to create content that is mobile-first, whether that is to scale for both, or just one. Additionally, users don't want to load up a web page or web app if all they get in return is a blatant desktop site. Web Designers and Content designers need to take advantage of the CSS Shrink to Fit behavior to help their designs handle the various devices that can come across the wire. This can all be resolved by delivering a mobile-first experience, however, this requires a lot of iteration, and a knowledge base of devices that a web designer can assess at different breakpoints. With ever-increasing pressure to deliver fast turnaround times, many organizations are turning to consumer-grade hardware and software to allow them to achieve speedy image-related tasks. Examples include editing on digital cameras, astutely incorporating one's favorite image editing tools on a camera phone, and converging on cloud-based photo editing tools once used only in the desktop applications. Automation is where creativity meets efficiency, and it's a major driver of change in the digital imaging landscape. The latest release of Photoshop allows for real-time, full automation on mobile devices, and on the web. The new features allow users to perform any type of digital editing and optimization right from their mobile devices.
